Wilds group files suit over Cache County records law

Environmental watchdog group Save Our Canyons sued the Utah State Records Committee and Cache County on Thursday over the group's right to access land records pertaining to roads on federal land that the county is seeking to control.

The environmental group is asking to see the documents and wants a Cache County records law voided by the courts because it is not properly aligned with Utah's Government Records Access Management law, according to court documents obtained Thursday.

The group filed a request for the records with the county in February, but the request was ignored. The organization then filed an appeal with Cache County Executive Lynn Lyon. It was also ignored.

In May, SOC filed an appeal with the State Records Committee but was told that the committee did not have jurisdiction over the case due to the Cache County records law.
